

NOTE When configuring an RW community, use some caution: configuring an RW community means that you have defined a clear-text password that can be used to configure many settings on the router or switch.

The following checklist details the commands used to configure SNMPv2c on a Cisco router or switch. This list shows the method to configure the RO and RW communities, plus a few optional but common settings (location and contact information).

- Step 1. Use the `snmp-server community community-string RO [ipv6 acl-name] [acl-name]` command in global configuration mode to enable the SNMP agent (if not already started), set the read-only community string, and restrict incoming SNMP messages based on the optional referenced IPv4 or IPv6 ACL.
- Step 2. (Optional) Use the `snmp-server community community-string RW [ipv6 acl-name] [acl-name]` command in global configuration mode to enable the SNMP agent (if not already started), set the read-write community string, and restrict incoming SNMP messages based on the optional referenced IPv4 or IPv6 ACL.
- Step 3. (Optional) If referenced by an `snmp-server community` command, configure an IPv4 or IPv6 ACL, with the same name or number referenced by the `snmp-server community` command, with the ACL permitting by matching the source IPv4 or IPv6 address of the allowed SNMP management hosts.
- Step 4. (Optional) Use the `snmp-server location text-describing-location` command in global configuration mode to document the location of the device.
- Step 5. (Optional) Use the `snmp-server contact contract-name` command in global configuration mode to document the person to contact if problems occur.

NOTE In the SNMP model, the SNMP agent acts as a server, with the NMS (SNMP Manager) acting as an SNMP client by requesting information with Get messages. The IOS `snmp-server` command happens to emphasize the idea that the SNMP agent on a router or switch acts as the SNMP server.

Example D-20 shows a sample configuration based on Figure D-12. The examples in this section come from Router R1, although the exact same SNMP configuration syntax could be used in the LAN switches or in R2. (The configuration of the location information would likely differ for each device, however.) Note that the configuration creates an IPv4 ACL that permits traffic with source IP address 10.1.3.3, which is the address of the NMS shown in the figure. It then defines read-only and read-write communities, along with the location and contact name for the router.
