

The Computer Animator's Technical Handbook

...the most common method of animation is to use a computer to generate a series of frames that are then displayed in sequence to create the illusion of motion. This process is known as frame-by-frame animation and is the most labor-intensive method of animation. However, with the advent of computer graphics, it has become possible to create animation using a more efficient method known as keyframe animation. In this method, the animator only needs to create a few keyframes, and the computer will automatically generate the frames in between. This method is much faster and more efficient than frame-by-frame animation, and it is the most commonly used method of animation today. Another method of animation is called motion capture, which involves recording the movements of a real person and then using that data to animate a digital character. This method is often used for creating realistic human characters in movies and video games. Finally, there is a method called procedural animation, which uses algorithms to generate animation. This method is often used for creating complex, organic-looking characters and environments. Each of these methods has its own strengths and weaknesses, and the choice of method depends on the specific needs of the project.
