

Computer-assisted language learning (CALL)

- The development of personal computers has made sophisticated language programs available to individual users, leading to 'computer-assisted language learning' (CALL).
- CALL allows learners to work on individual computers and video input into learning programs on a scale previously unimaginable.
- Current CALL programs are interactive, tailoring their input and tasks to individual learners' progress.

Corpora

- Computing technology has enabled the analysis of large databases of language, providing insights into language's workings, lexical patterning, and the differences between spoken and written discourse.
- This has made descriptive grammar possible, and evidence from corpus linguistics is likely to continue to influence applied linguistic thinking.
