The electricity supply is primarily generated from coal, which accounts for approximately 60% of the total energy production. Natural gas and hydroelectric power also contribute significantly to the energy mix. The government has implemented various policies to attract private investment in the power sector, leading to the construction of new power plants and the expansion of the transmission network. International organizations like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund have provided financial support and technical assistance to improve the efficiency of the power sector. The local community has also played a role in financing and maintaining the infrastructure, particularly in rural areas. Public-private partnerships have been instrumental in the development of large-scale power projects. The use of renewable energy sources, such as solar and wind, is increasing, although it still represents a small portion of the total supply. Infrastructure development, including the construction of roads and bridges, has facilitated the expansion of the electricity grid. Policy reforms, such as the introduction of competitive bidding for power generation, have helped to reduce costs and improve the quality of service. Technological innovation, particularly in the area of smart grids and renewable energy storage, is expected to play a key role in the future of the electricity supply. Regulatory changes, such as the establishment of an independent regulatory body, have helped to create a more transparent and accountable power sector.
