ABSTRACT

The numbers of Hispanic and African American older adults in the United States are expected to increase by 86% and more than 31%, respectively. African American and Hispanic American individuals are more likely than Caucasian individuals to have chronic health conditions, and researchers have argued that these health disparities may contribute to their higher rates of dementia-related illnesses. The current article explores strategies to improve participation in cognitive aging research by older adults, particularly minority older adults. The cultural aspects of cognitive aging are examined, particularly the role of stigma and stereotype threat. The perceptions of cognitive aging of African American and Hispanic older adults are also described. Specific strategies are presented that have been successfully implemented to improve recruitment and retention in research targeting minority older adults. Strategies that yielded retention of minority older adults included advertising and marketing a randomized clinical trial, media relations, intervention tailoring, and adaptation of psychometric instruments. [Journal of Gerontological Nursing, xx(x), xx-xx.]

In the United States, the numbers of Hispanic American and African American individuals 65 and older are expected to increase sharply between the years 2012 and 2050. In 2050, Hispanic older adults are expected to account for 20% of the population, up from 7% in 2010, whereas African American older adults are projected at 12%, up from 9% in 2010 (Vincent & Velkoff, 2010). Despite changes in the U.S. population, racial and ethnic minorities remain underrepresented in research.

Twenty years of research have produced insights into recruiting and retaining older adults from diverse ethnic and racial backgrounds in research (Ballard, Nash, Rai-ford, & Harrell, 1993; McDougall, Holston, & Wilke, 2001). However, the issues for minorities have not dimin-
