Oakland Co., MI 7/12/2009 © Darlene Friedman

The iridescent blue-green plumage of the upper-parts coupled with a clear white breast and undersides make this cavity nesting species a common sight along shorelines and at inland locations where nest boxes are erected in open habitats (Turner and Rose 1989, Pinkowski 1991, Robertson et al. 1992).

The Tree Swallow is a breeding species of the central and northern portions of the continental U.S. northward to the limit of the tree-line in the Canadian provinces and Alaska. The species is largely absent from arid or heavily forested areas, where it is locally distributed. It is associated with open fields, lakeshores, and wetland margins where nesting cavities in trees have been excavated by woodpeckers, or in human supplied nest boxes in otherwise upland locations. The species winters in coastal areas from the Carolinas southward into the Florida peninsula and the island of Cuba and on the Pacific coast from Mexico northward to southern California (Turner and Rose 1989, Robertson et al. 1992).

Distribution

In Michigan, the species is widely distributed across the entire state, with highest density based upon BBS route data in central Michigan west of Saginaw Bay, where 10 to 30 birds per route were recorded between 1994 and 2003 (Sauer et al. 2008). The species density drops to between one and three birds per route in the eastern UP and in the heavily urbanized area of the southeast Michigan surrounding the Detroit metropolitan area of the southern LP (Sauer et al. 2008).

The BBS route data and results of both MBBA I and MBBA II reflect the species' historical distribution. Barrows (1912) states "This is probably our most abundant and uniformly distributed swallow...", and adds that the species is less plentiful in the southern part of the state. Wood (1951) adds that Sager listed the species in his 1839 report and that the species was a common summer resident. Less than a decade later, Zimmerman and Van Tyne (1959) further refined the species' status, stating it was a summer resident and that it was common in the north, except on Isle Royale where it was uncommon. They further note that it was formerly common in the southern third of the state and was considered rather local and only fairly common as a breeding bird. Given the increase in the human population on inland lakes for home building, the loss of dead snags for nesting in southern Michigan is not entirely
