

Then a pressure is exercised upon the horse's mouth, in order to bring its head, or rather face line, in a perpendicular position to the ground, keeping the neck so high, as not to permit the nose to descend below the line of the hip.

This lesson tends to supple the joint which connects the first vertebrae of the neck with the head.

To make the horse live and active in the mouth, and to induce the same to yield early to the pressure of the bit, the left hand moves the bit in the horse's mouth, in circular motion of about two inches in radius, and by giving immediate and perfect freedom with the rein, at each degree of obedience yielded by the horse, the latter will soon cease to resist and seek of itself the position in which it finds the comfort of meeting with a light hand.

We then proceed by flexing the next joint between the first and second vertebrae of the neck; by giving increased tension to the right rein and taking care to maintain the vertical position of the head, we obtain the lateral position of the same to the right.

INCORRECT. CORRECT.
POSITION OF HEAD TO THE RIGHT.

Thus we continue, carefully avoiding all contortion, to flex the entire neck of the horse until his face stands opposite the puff of the saddle.

The same proceeding is to be followed, flexing the horse to the left.

Due consideration must be given to natural obstacles, such as short-thick, or misconstructured necks of all kinds, and no amount of patience must be spared in overcoming each hindrance by degrees.

Force, would lead to making the lesson painful to the horse, undermine the understanding between trainer and horse and excite resistance on the part of the latter.

After the erect position of the neck has been confirmed, and complete pliability established, we may consider ourselves in control of those parts, and can now go on with the securing of the obedience of the hind-hand of the horse, to limb and spur.
