

A tell-all had just hit the newsstands. The author, a friend of Nicole's named Faye Resnick, had written some very damaging things about O. J. Simpson. Ito had worked himself into a lather over the possibility that our jurors might have seen the book. He sent Deirdre out to buy copies for each of us. Then he suspended the voir dire until we could all read it and assess the damage.

I'd already talked to Faye—or at least I'd tried. Early on in the case I'd hooked up with some of Nicole's buddies, notably Kris Jenner, the former wife of Robert Kardashian, who had since married Olympic decathlon champion Bruce Jenner. Kris was an absolute gem, and she didn't seem to care much for her ex. She had the strange habit of referring to him as "Kardashian." I got the feeling they stayed on speaking terms only because they had four children in common. Kris and her friend Candace Garvey put me in touch with several of the Brentwood crowd. Among these was Cynthia "Cici" Shahian, who, coincidentally, was a cousin of Kardashian's. She'd been elusive at first: I'd leave messages that were never returned. But after a couple of months, she showed up in my office, flanked by Kris and Candace. Cici was extremely valuable. She'd been standing next to Nicole when Nicole got Simpson's letter threatening to turn her in to the IRS. Cici had been able not only to identify the letter, but to describe Nicole's furious reaction to it.

During the first few weeks of the case, Kris and Candace had been working on my behalf to reel in Resnick. Faye, a wealthy divorcée and, as she was most often described, a "West Side socialite," was a friend of the Jenners. Kris had introduced her to Nicole about two years earlier. Faye, too, was elusive, but Kris managed to coax her into my office late one night in July.
