Symbiosis and Soil

by Mathilde Anne Hungerford

The concept of symbiosis, an inter-dependent relationship existing between two organisms from which they both benefit, is not new. As early as 1869 Schwendener, a Swiss botanist, cited lichen as an example of two organisms, a fungus and an alga, living symbiotically.

His idea was not well received among his colleagues, and while some biologists pursued this possibility it was generally ignored. In 1885 a German forest pathologist coined the term

'mycorrhiza' in reference to the association between a plant root and a fungus.

He later added the terms 'ectotrophic' and 'endotrophic' to refer to fungus living outside and inside the plant root (1). At this point people were finally beginning to take notice, although research was still slow and on a small scale, some of the most eminent British botanists were vehemently opposed to the idea.

Beatrix Potter, 12 years later, presented some of the first concrete evidence supporting Schwendener's theory in a series of highly detailed drawings showing the two organisms, and wrote a paper which was read at the British Linnaean Society where Darwin had, years before, presented his theory of evolution. Her paper was read by her uncle, since women were not permitted. Again, however, the audience paid little or no attention, since not only was the topic still out of fashion, but the paper was written by a woman. Beatrix Potter abandoned her biological aspirations and turned to illustrations, for which she is famous today. A hundred years after her paper was first presented the Linnaean Society issued an official apology (3,4).

Symbiosis finally 'came into fashion' in the mid-1900's. More and more evidence was mounting in support of the theory, specifically, radioactive tracers had been developed, allowing scientists to actually trace nutrient cycles in plants and their fungal associates. Interest increased as people took notice for the first time on a widespread scale. In 1963 the first international conference on symbiosis was held in London. By the
