

If the welding had been done correctly the work was now as strong as a single piece of iron. If it failed, however, the practical smith took new stock and began again, for he knew that the difficulty of getting iron to weld increased with each additional attempt.

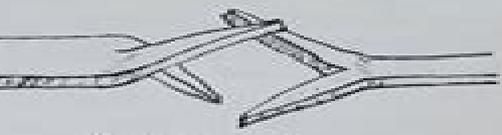

Depending on what he was making, the smith cut his iron to make one of several types of joints. The lap weld, faggot weld, cleft or split weld and jump welding. In all these types of joints, the welding principle was the same, and the blacksmith prepared his iron with the same concern for the exclusion of air and scale.
