Objectives: The present study compares coping of elderly people and two younger groups 1 year after a war. Coping was determined by stress symptoms and posttraumatic recovery and two levels of resilience. Design and Setting: Telephone surveys (covering most of the city streets) were sampled randomly from the neighborhood of Kfar Shimon (a town next to the Lebanese border) about a year after the end of the Second Lebanon War. Participants: The sample constituted 470 adult residents of the town. Participants were divided into three age groups: elderly (age 65 years and older, $N = 165$), adults (age 46–64 years, $N = 252$) and young adults (age 20–45 years, $N = 462$). Measurements: 1) Stress symptoms measured by short version of Brief Symptom Inventory; 2) Individual resilience measured by Sense of Coherence Inventory; 3) Posttraumatic Recovery Inventory (PTRI); and 4) Public Resilience Scale (included a scale for community and national resilience). Results: The results indicated 1) The elderly group reported significantly higher levels of stress symptoms and lower levels of PTRI; 2) Females in the three age groups reported higher levels of stress symptoms and lower levels of PTRI and individual resilience than males; 3) Individual and public resilience negatively predicted stress symptoms and positively predicted posttraumatic recovery, across three age groups; and 4) Public resilience has a differential effect on stress symptoms in each of the three age groups but not on PTRI. Conclusion: Results question the division of older people into a vulnerable or invulnerable group, indicating that the participants responded concurrently in a more vulnerable and a more resilient manner. Older people were characterized by higher levels of postwar stress symptoms, as well as a higher sense of coherence. (Am J Geriatr Psychiatry 2012; 20:391–401)

Key Words: Age and gender, individual and public resilience, posttraumatic recovery, senior citizens, senior resilience, senior vulnerability, stress symptoms

The present study focuses on the distinction between elderly people and two younger age groups in relation to two potential long-term outcomes: stress symptoms and posttraumatic recovery, and two levels of resilience, 1 year after a war. The main question of the current study is whether elderly people differ in their resilience and vulnerability from two younger age groups.
