

Divestiture Process

Prepare the organization

- Explain to employees the rationale for the divestiture and why it is essential to the corporation's health.
- Introduce forcing mechanisms to ensure that managers actively consider divestiture.

Identify candidates

- Establish concrete criteria for determining candidates, including a unit's impact on the rest of the corporation, the corporation's impact on the unit, the unit's ability to meet or surpass market expectations, and the optimal portfolio for the company.
- Analyze the practical issues (such as taxes, availability of buyers, and so forth) to narrow the list of candidates.

Structure the deal

- Identify buyers and determine how best to structure the sale (for example a simple sale for cash, a spin-off to shareholders, or complex structures involving two-step transactions and contingent compensation).
- Ensure that employees are not distracted during the sale process, perhaps by offering them additional incentives.

Communicate the decision

- Hold off on the sale announcement until the completion of the deal seems likely.
- Communicate the reason for the sale concisely and simply.

Create new businesses

- Reinvest the funds, management time, and support-function capacities in attractive new growth opportunities.
