FINANCING OF WORKING CAPITAL

26. INTRODUCTION

After determining the amount of working capital required, the next step to be taken by the finance manager is to arrange the funds.

As discussed earlier, it is advisable that the finance manager bifurcate the working capital requirements between the permanent working capital and temporary working capital.

The permanent working capital is always needed irrespective of sales fluctuation; hence it should be financed by the long-term sources such as debt and equity. On the contrary the temporary working capital may be financed by the short-term sources of finance.

Broadly speaking, the working capital finance may be classified between the two categories:

- (i) Spontaneous sources; and
- (ii) Negotiable sources.

Spontaneous Sources: Spontaneous sources of finance are those which naturally arise in the course of business operations. Trade credit, credit from employees, credit from suppliers of services, etc. are some of the examples which may be quoted in this respect.

Negotiated Sources: On the other hand, the negotiated sources, as the name implies, are those which have to be specifically negotiated with lenders say, commercial banks, financial institutions, general public etc.

The finance manager has to be very careful while selecting a particular source, or a combination thereof for financing of working capital. Generally, the following parameters will guide his decisions in this respect:

- (i) Cost factor
- (ii) Impact on credit rating
