

Symptom Clusters in Cancer (PDQ®) – Health Professional Version

Overview

During and after treatment for cancer, patients experience an average of 10 to 14 co-occurring symptoms.[1,2] Compared with patients with few or no symptoms, patients with multiple concurrent symptoms may experience worse decrements in physical and cognitive function,[3-6] quality of life,[3-6] and overall survival.[7] Symptoms that occur together over time may form a cluster.

A symptom cluster is two or more concurrent symptoms with the following properties:[1,8]

- The concurrent symptoms within the cluster are stable (i.e., the same symptoms that comprise clusters are identified at different time points throughout the cancer care trajectory).
- The symptoms within a cluster may share underlying mechanisms.
- The symptoms within a cluster may share outcomes.
- The symptom cluster may have a temporal dimension (i.e., the severity of the symptoms within the cluster may shift together over time).

Symptoms in a cluster may be related to each other in multiple ways. They may share a common set of biological, psychological, or social mechanisms, or they may cause or potentiate one another's effects.[8] They may also be due to side effects of another treatment. The management of symptom clusters primarily involves identifying relationships among the symptoms. This approach supports strategies that may address multiple symptoms simultaneously. It also avoids unnecessary interventions that can worsen symptom burden and the patient's quality of life. As advancements in symptom science research are achieved, better therapeutic targets will be identified for improved management of symptom clusters and outcomes.
