emperors activity that amounted to much more than idle chatter Caillan Davenport uses ancient evidence including letters graffiti and songs to reveal how Romans engaged in politics outside the senate house or imperial council He argues that the idea of the Roman emperor was shaped not only by the political powers granted to him but also by the debate taking place in the streets churches taverns and markets Davenport reveals how Romans spoke about the emperor as a figure of stability as an agent of justice and retribution or as a fallible human Although few would ever see an emperor his face and therefore his power was everywhere on coins banners standards and even dessert molds as well as in statuary and paintings While most Romans did not question the transformation of their republic into a monarchical system of government they were indeed invested in the empire and were in constant discussion about the type of ruler they had wanted and deserved Late
