

The inaugural meeting of the Labour Representation Committee (LRC) took place in Memorial Hall in 1900 when the Labour Party was initially established. Leaders of the Trade Union Congress and socialists from the Independent Labour Party (ILP), established in 1893, made up this committee. The members of the LRC were among the original supporters of the Labour Party. They had become disenchanted with traditional politics and sought a group to speak for working class issues.

TRADE UNION:

An organisation of workers from a particular trade or profession formed to defend its members' employment rights and to encourage employers to make reforms that will benefit workers' interests.

The original Liberty logo, in use until 1983

Keir Hardie, a Scottish miner, trade unionist and journalist, was a committee member. Ten years prior, Hardie had run for Parliament as an ILP candidate. Members of the LRC ran for office for the first time in the general election of 1906. The LRC altered its name, and the Labour Party was established with Hardie as its head and 29 MPs in the House of Commons.

1918
