

objective of Black Revolutionaries in America as the transformation of the American society; an obvious conclusion if one has an a-historical analysis....

"We know that any ideology concerning African people, who have been maliciously scattered all over the world, during the calculated period of the disruption of our society, must consider all the component parts while maintaining "the core of the Black Revolution in Africa."

This view suggests that Blacks in the United States should work primarily for African liberation rather than for their own liberation. The theoretical underpinnings of this sort of pan-Africanism are faulty, as John Henry points out:-

In regard to Afro-Americans, Pan Africanism negates historical change in two major ways: it maintains that they are Africans as they have always been, and that Africa is the focus of the struggle of black people all over the world and it has always been. This view negates the historical struggles of Afro-American people to being misguided and misinformed, because the goal has been to transform this country into a just society for all people and not primarily to transform Africa.

The second type of pan-Africanism argues that there should be a fight against the oppression of Black people in the United States and in Africa. Imperialism is seen as an international system headquartered in the United States that exploits Black people "at home and abroad." These pan-Africanists and nationalists argue that defeating U.S. imperialism at home is the basis for the liberation of Black people in the United States and a contribution to the liberation of Africa, as well as Black people in the "diaspora" (a Yiddish term which means "to scatter" and refers to Black people dispersed throughout the world by the slave trade).

THE PROSPECTS FOR PAN-AFRICANISM AND NATIONALISM

John Henry, who is neither pan-Africanist nor a nationalist, makes these observations concerning pan-Africanism in Africa:

On the international scale, Pan Africanism can be a positive force if it contributes to the united front. . . . But the struggle is sharpening up in Africa, particularly southern Africa, and becoming more complicated. It is especially complicated because in many cases there is the task of overthrowing reactionaries in the U.S. camp while also defeating the "wizards of Oz" social-imperialists, who can bribe opportunistic elements or mislead honest forces into vacillating on opposing their superpower hegemonic plans. Pan Africanism as an ideology won't provide the answers to these complex problems because it fails to correctly and concretely analyze the forces at work. It does not base itself on the analysis of different class forces within Africa, or on the fact that Africa is not an undifferentiated whole but a continent divided into countries facing some common problems but also different conditions. It also has no clear analysis of the nature of different countries, including the Soviet Union. Clearly Pan Africanism cannot lead the struggle for liberation in Africa.
