ABSTRACT

This paper examines the acceptance of Google Apps in higher education through the lens of the Theory of Planned Behavior (TPB). It explores the relationship between attitudes, subjective norms, perceived behavioral control, and the intention to use Google Apps among university professors. The study reviews previous research on the factors influencing the adoption of Google Apps and TPB's application in educational settings. The findings provide insights into enhancing the integration of digital tools in educational environments.

1.Introduction

The paper consists of several sections: context and research questions, research context, LMS and GAFE tool, literature review, theoretical framework and research model, research methods, results, discussion, conclusion. This study examines the impact of GAFE on students' intention to use it. Using the TPB, self-efficacy, perceived behavioral control, satisfaction, and service quality, the study collected data from 230 students and analyzed it using PLS and multiple regressions. The analysis shows that subjective norms, attitudes, and self-efficacy predict students' intentions to use GAFE in a business marketing context. The paper argues that university students should be proficient in using technology provided by their institution.
