

IMAGING ENERGIES

Architecture's shape (the physical edges that control a person's movement, the spatial typologies that organize activities, and the aesthetic qualities conveyed) is created through a dialogue between the building materials used and the human body's ability to detect the boundaries those materials produce. Particles and waves of energy produce gradients of intensity, requiring the human body's sensory perception to be sensitive enough to detect and respond to the properties of these more blurred edge conditions. The shape of this architecture is a result of a graceful calibration between the senses of the human body and the material energies that the body can perceive and come into contact with.
