

Characterizing transport of natural and anthropogenic constituents in a long-term agricultural watershed in the northeastern United States

T.L. Veith, H.E. Preisendorfer, and K.R. Edlin

Abstract As recent technologies enable water samples to be collected at increasingly shorter time intervals, water quality data can more fully capture the range of conditions a stream experiences over time. Various metrics can be employed with the large, high-temporal resolution (i.e., subdaily) data sets to gain insights into the hydroclimatic and biogeochemical processes affecting chemical fate and transport. These insights can be helpful in understanding the extent to which anthropogenic activities have impacted the natural response of some constituents, such as nutrients and salts, in managed landscapes. Here, nearly four years (12,514 samples from 2015 to 2019) of water quality data for 12 constituents of interest were collected using three sampling strategies: (1) low-frequency sampling three times per week, (2) high-temporal resolution flow-paced sampling to capture stormflow, and (3) high-frequency time-paced sampling with a time interval of four hours. Seasonal trends were investigated to understand concentration variability over time, and concentration-discharge (C-Q) relationships were developed to categorize the transport dynamics of each constituent. Loss rate curves and Gini coefficients were employed to quantify the temporal inequality of the constituent loads discharged at the watershed outlet and understand the extent to which the transport behaviors of geogenic constituents and those affected by anthropogenic activities differed. Overall, the results suggested that nearly all of the geogenic constituents, plus nitrate-nitrogen ($\text{NO}_3\text{-N}$) and sulfate ($\text{SO}_4\text{-S}$), exhibited cherrypick dynamics with loads overwhelmingly controlled by flow variability, whereas aluminum (Al), iron (Fe), nitrite-N ($\text{NO}_2\text{-N}$), and orthophosphate ($\text{PO}_4\text{-P}$) exhibited episodic transport dynamics that were likely controlled by limited source availability. Since the transport of $\text{NO}_3\text{-N}$ was found to be similar to the transport of common geogenic constituents for the region, this suggests that decades of agricultural activities in the watershed have led to the emergence of legacy N sources, while the episodic dynamics observed for $\text{PO}_4\text{-P}$ suggest that best management practices appear to have prevented the emergence of P legacy sources.

Key words: agriculture—CEAP—concentration-discharge—geogenic constituents—legacy nutrients—surface water

The temporal resolutions over which surface water samples are collected can profoundly affect our understanding of how water quality changes over time, uncover the benefits or limitations of best management practices, and provide insight into whether or not legacy nutrient sources are present. Traditional water sampling strategies have been based on routine grab sampling methodologies that involve a person physically collecting water samples at a point of interest at regular intervals of time (i.e., bi-weekly, monthly, or quarterly). More recent modifications of time-interval water quality sampling involve deployment of automated samplers that can be programmed to collect grab samples at shorter time intervals (i.e., hours, days, or weeks) based on time interval or flow stage, such that all filled bottles in the sampler can be physically retrieved in a single visit. If continued for sufficiently long periods of time (i.e., years to decades), these sampling strategies can provide for a robust analysis of how baseflow water quality changes over time in response to changes in land use or land management.

In an effort to improve our understanding of the environmental benefits of past agricultural conservation practices and to maximize the contributions of current and future conservation practices, the USDA Natural Resources Conservation Service (NRCS) Conservation Effects Assessment Project (CEAP; USDA NRCS 2019) has promoted ongoing watershed monitoring and modeling efforts in CEAP watersheds and the more recently established research program of the Long-term Agroecosystem Research Network (LTAR; USDA ARS 2019). In conjunction with these efforts, temporal sampling strategies have been evaluated for practicality and effectiveness at the plot (2.2×10^4 ha) and small watershed scale (<25 km²) (King and Harmel 2008; King et al. 2005). The most effective sampling strategies would capture the full range of a vast array of constituent concentrations and ensure both baseflow and stormflow dynamics are appropriately captured.

The temporal resolution at which samples are collected is of critical importance in development of accurate concentration-discharge (C-Q) relationships, which provide valuable insights into the extent to which hydrologic and biogeochemical variability are driving the transport dynamics of a constituent of interest (Bacu et al. 2011; Thompson et al. 2011) and to calculate loads with minimal errors (Harmel et al. 2003). If a constituent of interest increases during surface runoff events, and high flow events are not adequately captured, then the true ranges of concentrations and loads are under estimated, with annual load underestimation being as high as 40% (Huggard et al. 2003; Ullrich and Volk 2010). However, storm-event sampling
