

Earth's energy imbalance results from increases in greenhouse gases absorbing thermal radiation that would otherwise be emitted to space. This radiative forcing leads to an accumulation of energy in the Earth's system

Earth's energy budget is influenced by:

New elements in this Chapter relative to AR5

- Advances in observing the energy budget show that Earth is warming everywhere, from multiple lines of evidence
- An improved radiative forcing concept from better understanding of adjustments
- Improved understanding of cloud processes leads to a better constrained cloud feedback
- New science shows that as the pattern of sea-surface temperature change evolves in time, feedbacks change, potentially affecting projections
- A tighter constraint on equilibrium climate sensitivity is possible, leading to improved surface temperature projections
- New emission metric approaches account for the different warming implications of short-lived and long-lived climate forcings

Assessment involves multiple lines of evidence from various sources:
