Abstract: Earth houses have been traditional residential buildings for a long time and their three different types (in-hill house, cave dwelling and atrium house) were separated during the early history. Modern earth houses appeared in the 1960s in the USA but spread only after the first oil crisis. Earth-sheltered houses became popular nowadays because of their several benefits (environmentally friendly, economical, energy savings, landscape protection). Unfortunately they have some disadvantages (negative prejudices, high building costs, special building constructions, complicated design and construction). Several design aspects (orientation, ventilation) are extremely important for in-earth embedded houses. Because of the non-conventional loads and landscape situations they have special building and supporting structures. They had also extraordinary damp-proofing and thermal insulation problems, this is why special solutions are needed to have pleasant and comfortable indoor atmosphere.

Keywords: in-earth embedding, earth-sheltering, special building structures

1. Introduction

In-earth embedded houses are not recent forms of the residential buildings. This tradition can be traced back thousands of years. The earth architecture today has been developed so far that it is now regarded as an architectural guideline, which can become a key element of the sustainable development of built environment. This approach may be able to solve the aesthetic and environmental harmonization with the landscape; the smart energy consumption and the healthy living environment can be taken into consideration in the same time.

This paper shows the historical archetypes of the kinds of in-earth embedded houses from ancient times to modern earth architecture. It summarizes the most important specific design aspects, advantages and disadvantages of these extraordinary buildings. It introduces the special supporting structures and the main damp-proofing and thermal insulating problems of them.
