Holmes,2017-11-22 Poor little Dora Deane How utterly wretched and desolate she was as she crouched before the scanty fire and tried to warm the little bit of worn out flannel with which to wrap her mother s feet and how hard she tried to force back the tears which would burst forth afresh whenever she looked upon that pale sick mother and thought how soon she would be gone It was a small low scantily furnished room high up in the third story of a crazy old building which Dora called her home and its one small window looked out on naught save the roofs and spires of the great city whose dull monotonous roar was almost the only sound to which she had ever listened Of the country with its bright green grass its sweet wild flowers its running brooks and its shady trees she knew but little for only once had she looked on all these things and then her heart was very sad for the bright green grass was broken and the sweet wild flowers were trampled down that a grave might be made in the dark moist earth for her father who had died in early manhood leaving his wife and only child to battle with the selfish world as best they could Since that time life had been long and dreary to the poor widow whose hours were well nigh ended for ere to morrow s sun was risen she would have a better home than that dreary cheerless room while Dora at the early age of twelve would be an orphan It was a cold December night the last one of the year and the wintry wind which swept howling past the curtainless window seemed to take a sadder tone as if in pity for the little girl who knelt upon the hearthstone and with the dim firelight flickering over her tear stained face prayed that she too might die and not be left alone It will be so lonely so cold without my mother she murmured Oh let me go with her I cannot live alone Dora my darling came faintly from the rude couch and in an instant the child was at her mother s side Winding her arms fondly about the neck of her daughter and pushing the soft auburn hair from off her fair open brow Mrs Deane gazed long and earnestly upon her face Yes you are
