Avoiding Mid-air Collisions Shari Stamford Krause, 1995 The specter of colliding with another aircraft is a constant threat in increasingly crowded airspace Haunted by her own harrowing near miss as a student pilot Shari Stamford Krause uncovered a sobering fact the Federal Aviation Administration anticipates a 300% rise in mid airs over the next 20 years Krause set out to produce a complete guide to making the not so friendly skies safer and in Avoiding Mid Air Collisions she delivers This breakthrough manual uses conventional means of collision avoidance and the latest research and technological developments to build a sophisticated comprehensive system of mid air collision avoidance Invaluable not only to small aircraft pilots and students but commercial small jet and airline pilots as well this noteworthy book is sure to become the preferred collision avoidance text at universities and flight schools

Mid-air Collision Prevention During VFR Flight Applied Psychology Corporation, 1952 The Federal Aviation Agency through contract with the Applied Psychology Corporation is conducting research intended to lead to a determination of requirements for lighting systems paint treatments and other conspicuity aids which will be of maximum assistance to pilots in avoiding mid air collisions during VFR flight Important among the relevant considerations are such human factors problems as the delineation of the optimum amount of information pilots need for evaluating collision threats and the specification of the most efficient operating procedures This booklet describes four test facilities which make up a portion of this contract effort The findings of the research will have application for 75% or more of all flights currently being flown in the United States

The Role of Visible Trails in Mid-air Collision Prevention Applied Psychology Corporation, 1962 This report summarizes that portion of a research program on visual mid air collision avoidance techniques which deals with the use of intentionally generated visible trails The aim was to determine the effectiveness of such trails as conspicuity aids under daytime VFR conditions Analytical review of the literature covers detection of various clouds dusts smokes and mists their capability of indicating flight path and their possible use with information coding techniques Technical and operational considerations in using trails are also considered The evidence provides both favorable and unfavorable indications of the merit of trails as aids for lessening the likelihood of collisions In good weather and with crossing flight paths detection range is increased Technical operational disadvantages are a high cost of installation and maintenance b toxicity and other hazards to aircraft and communities c severe weight requirements and d unreliability of the visible signal These disadvantages are great enough to preclude recommending a requirement that trails be generated for use in preventing mid air collision
