Inheritance in Modern Danish Blended Families

Abstract Divorce, remarriage and new partnerships create blended families with complex configurations of emotional and financial engagements. The latest reform of the Danish Inheritance Act in 2008 was an attempt to cope with the legal challenges posed by blended families with regard to inheritance. The solution was to grant the surviving spouse greater rights as well as a greater share of the estate, thus favouring the horizontal conjugal bond between current spouses. Since the surviving spouse is often not the parent of all the deceased's children, the vertical transfer of assets and heirlooms between generations is challenged. This has consequences for the way material things can generate continuities and act to reproduce kinship over time, as a way of kinning former and coming generations. This article addresses the role of inheritance and heirlooms in processes of kinning and de-kinning.

Not only had Peter in general seemed a disillusioned man, he had also left me in doubt about the strength of my ideas about the importance of heirlooms in Danish inheritance practices and the capacity of such material objects to align former and coming generations. Peter had refuted all my allusions to the significance of inheriting. Quite the opposite, he had refused to receive any objects from his deceased's mother's home. In addition, he had spent the modest amount of money he inherited from her by inviting his wife on an expensive holiday, way above their normal standard: 'I just got rid of it as fast as possible', he told me. His relationship with his deceased mother was described in very few words: 'I didn't get along with my parents, and I left my childhood home as soon as I could. I prefer not to look back.' Later in the project I came to understand that Peter was the exception to the general rule, that people readily admit that inheritance in the form of personal assets (things as well as money) matters to them in various ways. However, by his actions Peter also confirmed this importance: declining his inheritance was part of a (de-)kinning process.

In this article I explore the significance of the conjugal bond vis-à-vis the generational link with regard to inheritance and show how two different concepts of kinship – one based on images of nature and 'blood' relations, the other on living ar-
