

Flux Conceptual Framework

- I. Flow is the movement of “stuff” from one point in a system to another point in the system .
- II. Flow occurs because of the existence of an energy gradient between two points in the system.
- III. More than one gradient may determine the magnitude and direction of the flow
 - A. Osmotic (concentration gradient) and hydrostatic pressures together determine flow across capillary walls.
 - B. Concentration gradients and electrical gradients determine ion flow through channels in cell membranes of neurons and muscle cells.
- IV. The magnitude of the flow is a direct function of the magnitude of the energy gradient that is present; the larger the gradient, the greater the flow.
- V. There is resistance or opposition to flow in all systems.
