Correction Concerning Howard et al. (2005)

J. Howard, C. Sparkman, H. Cohen, G. Green, and H. Stanislaw

We would like to take this opportunity to correct some misrepresentations of our study "A comparison of intensive behavior analytic and eclectic treatments for young children with autism" (Howard et al., 2005) that have appeared in this journal and elsewhere.

Although we welcome thoughtful and informed criticisms of our research, we think the field and the best interests of children with autism are seriously jeopardized by the dissemination of unfounded statements and insinuations about the study and those involved in it. To attenuate those harms, we respectfully offer the following pertinent facts about the Howard et al. (2005) study:

- The nonpublic agency that provided intensive behavior analytic treatment to the experimental group in our study has never refused to serve a child with autism who was referred to its in-home or center-based programs from any of its 17 different funding sources (Special Education Local Planning Agencies, Regional Centers, and school districts), as long as there were adequate resources to staff and supervise the programming.
- Children who participated in our study were actually served and referred to the study by two different Regional Centers.
- Neither the staff of the nonpublic agency nor any Regional Center staff person ever directed a child to be placed in any particular intervention program.
- All 61 IEP/IFSP teams responsible for the educational placements of the children in the study acted in accordance with state and federal laws governing special education placement and procedures. That is, those teams -- not the authors of the study or any other single individuals -- decided which type of intervention children would receive.
- Children were not randomly assigned to groups because of serious ethical and practical constraints; additionally, doing so would have violated the aforementioned laws. Rather, participants were selected for our study from larger pools of children in the three types of programs in such a way as to constitute matched treatment and comparison groups. Consistent with recommended tactics for field research of this nature, the groups were matched as closely as possible on variables that have been found to correlate with treatment outcomes in previous studies. We did not merely assume that the matching procedures resulted in groups that were substantially similar when the study began; rather, we demonstrated it empirically, as described in our paper. The small number of variables on which the groups differed significantly pre-treatment were controlled for in our statistical analyses, also described in our paper.
- Our study, which was published in a respected peer-reviewed journal, substantially replicated the methods and results of a previous study conducted by independent investigators in another country (Eikeseth, Smith, Jahr, & Eldevik, 2002). It also corroborates several other published studies of early intensive behavior analytic treatment for autism.
