

17 Managing Below-ground Interactions in Agroecosystems

Meka R. Rao, Goetz Schroth, Sandy E. Williams, Sara Namirembe, Michaela Schaller and Julia Wilson

Key questions:

1. Can plant species with complementary root characteristics be used to optimize the exploitation of below-ground resources and limit competition?
2. Under what conditions will farmers invest labour and resources in the management of below-ground interactions?
3. What practical options are available for manipulating below-ground interactions in agroforestry systems?

17.1 Introduction

Below-ground interactions (BGI) among component species in mixed agroecosystems encompass the temporal and spatial exploitation of growth resources (water and nutrients), soilborne pests and diseases, and modification of the rhizosphere environment. Interactions can be either direct or indirect, depending largely on whether the system is simultaneous or rotational. Previous chapters of this book (Chapters 1 and 4) have provided clear evidence of the importance of BGI for the functioning of agroforestry and other land-use systems. Of the different BGI, interactions involving growth resources are by far the most important, as they have the greatest effect on productivity (which is where farmers' primary interests lie). Whereas competition for water is the dominant interaction in semiarid environments and during dry seasons or dry spells in humid climates, competition for nutrients is important in many soils across a wide range of environments. Mixed or simultaneous systems in which two or more species are grown together on the same piece of land are most common in the tropics, and traditional agroforestry systems often involve many species. The BGI in such systems are much more complex than in mixed annual systems due to the combination of perennial and short-lived crops, which are of very different sizes, and which occupy overlapping niches below ground. The interactions among these components change over both time and space as trees grow larger and crops are planted, harvested and replanted. A certain degree of competition is inevitable
