The Christian Conversion Experience
Denise Miller, 1989 Abstract The purpose of this qualitative research study was to examine and describe the life experience of Christian men and women following their commitment to Christianity as a religious belief system As a subjective study the author's own experience was explored along with the experiences of eight co-researchers A thorough literature search revealed that several related studies have been conducted on various aspects of the Christian experience but no study focused on this particular dimension An overview of these studies is included within the body of this thesis The co-researchers ranged in ages from 27-78 and were from various denominational backgrounds All participated in a two-hour tape-recorded interview utilizing focus questions in guiding the description of their experience Several common themes emerged from their detailed descriptions Verbatim selections from the interviews are included in the thesis to substantiate these themes The themes were categorized into pre-conversion conversion and post-conversion life experiences Each theme is explored in great detail revealing the nature of the experience for each person A sense of a lack of direction purpose and meaning in life was the prevailing theme in the pre-conversion phase This was followed by a calling out to God for help often out of severe desperation The conversion experience encompassed this call for help and included an immediate sense of relief The co-researchers articulated numerous on-going changes that occurred from that point forward including a new found sense of meaning purpose and direction in their lives a sense of a personal relationship with God that was accompanied by an intense desire to learn more about Him via church and Bible study and the freedom from various disturbing feelings and behavior patterns such as bitterness guilt loneliness anxiety fear of death and alcohol and substance abuse All of the co-researchers agreed that the conversion process is an on-going one affecting all of their relationships and all aspects of their lives The findings of this study could be helpful within the realms of psychology theology or sociology or as a contribution to the reader's own spiritual quest
