

I have concentrated on Mr. Miller's presuppositions and convictions rather than on the details of his historical chapters; for these must obviously be read in the light of such convictions. His summaries are competent and presented with a dangerous appearance of clarity: they are, indeed, often too "slick," and calculated to lead the busy reader to ignore the author's own excellent emphasis on the need to go to the original texts. Mr. Miller's fondness for superlatives, especially laudatory superlatives, is also excessive. There are too many "greatest" advocates or pioneers of this or that in his pages. It contributes little to the history of philosophy to label someone as a "master mind" or to talk of claims to "undying fame." This sort of method surely went out with the fashion of looking for "fathers" and "founders" of "schools of philosophy."

Neither as an historian nor as a philosopher is Mr. Miller content with less than finality. In his anxiety to miss nothing that may contribute to his synthesis, he is often, as already noted, much too generous to his authors. On the other hand, he seems to think (e.g., p. 96) that "conclusive evidence" can be discovered, in the course of history, against certain metaphysical systems. His six hundred odd pages would have been of greater value had they been ruthlessly curtailed by about half. This could probably have been achieved by the deletion of rhetorical flourishes, picturesque metaphors, and exaggerated superlatives. As it is, many of them throw more significant light on contemporary American culture than they do on the history of philosophy.

The book is attractively produced and well indexed. I noticed only one misprint—"sciene" for "science" on p. 48.

D. J. McCracken.

Civilisation and Religious Values. By H. D. A. MAJOR. (Allen & Unwin, Price 7s. 6d.)

When Dr. Major resigned his office as Principal of Ripon Hall, he received an enthusiastic demonstration of gratitude from his fellow Modernists. For he has suffered for his brave advocacy of unpopular views. As he says in this book, "a scientific religion cannot advance without ideals and without martyrs."

These Hibbert Lectures are an admirable presentation of the writer's convictions, his hopes and his fears. Civilization cannot endure without religion, and religion for us must mean Christianity purged of unyielding traditionalism and ready to accept a progressive revelation. Both science and humanism have much to teach us; it is a mistake to regard humanism as an enemy, even when humanists like Prof. Gilbert Murray refuse to call themselves Christians. The early lectures deal with some of the subjects of Toynbee's great work, and we may wonder that Dr. Major does not refer to it.

Liberal Churchmen may differ on minor points. We are tired of Tennyson's too popular lines about the one far-off event to which the whole creation moves. Unless we reject what the French call the principle of Carnot, and we the law of entropy, the one far-off event is the total extinction of life everywhere. Dr. Major seems to be a perfectibilist. He rather rashly thinks that the words of Christ about the broad and the narrow gate were not meant to refer to the future. And yet he rejects the "heresy" of an ineluctable law of progress.

Personally, though here I am in a minority even among Liberal theologians, I think it very unlikely that "the prophet of Nazareth in Galilee" ever believed Himself to be that figment of bellicose nationalism, the Messiah. The Jewish Church invested Him with this honour, as the Greeks called Him
