interferences. These two ions are best removed with a cation exchange resin. This same treatment will also increase the permissible concentration of magnesium. If no exchange resin is available, these ions may be removed by precipitation as the hydroxides.

Study of Precision. A statistical study of the determination of thiocyanate with the copper-pyridine reagent was made. Known amounts of thiocyanate were added to sewage and determined in the described manner. Because the color system does not follow Beer's law, the standard deviation from the mean rather than from the regression line was calculated. The results are shown in Table VIII.

Similar studies were made with a Bausch and Lomb and a Zeiss filter photometer. The same order of precision was attained with these instruments.

This investigation was made because it was found that when fluorine was determined in certain forage samples by the procedure of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, the results depended upon the sample weights. Data are presented which indicate that calcination of samples in the presence of lime and large amounts of silica may cause conversion of fluorine to a form refractory to distillation. Fusion of the ash with sodium hydroxide was found to release the bound fluorine. Modifications of the method for determining fluorine are proposed. The new procedure permits correction of the substantial errors which may be encountered when forage materials containing large amounts of silica are analyzed.

SINCE the advent of the Willard and Winter (1) method for isolating fluorine from interfering elements, many reports have appeared recommending modifications to improve the accuracy of this accepted procedure. Generally the modifications were made for the purpose of adapting the procedure to analysis of a particular type of sample.

Churchill, Bridges, and Howley (2) reported interference by phosphate when a single distillation from sulfuric acid was employed, and recommended a double distillation for eliminating this difficulty. Clifford (3-5) reported the results obtained by a number of collaborators when studying sources of relatively small errors, with emphasis on the method of titration. These results demonstrated the reliability of the method, within certain limits of accuracy, for some types of samples. MacIntire et al. (7, 8) found that the practice of calcining soil charges at high temperatures with calcium oxide resulted in poor fluorine recoveries when the double distillation procedure was employed. The direct distillation from sulfuric acid, without prior calcination and followed by distillation from perchloric acid, was found to give much more satisfactory recoveries of the fluorine in certain soils. Loss by volatilization during the calcination step was believed to be the cause of poor recoveries in soil samples (7). Willard, Torbara, and Holland (11) described an electronically controlled apparatus for distilling the fluorine, and recently Willard and Hurton (9, 10) contributed new information on methods for titrating fluorine.

Most of the vast literature pertaining to the analytical method for fluorine has, since the introduction of the Willard and Winter method, resulted in modifications of a minor nature. The procedure as originally described has proved capable of giving results which are essentially correct, requiring changes only to ensure a high degree of accuracy. Modified Willard and Winter proced-
