An Analysis of the Art Image Interchange Cycle Within Fine Art Museums Evan Andersen,2010 The art image interchange cycle is the procedure carried out by fine art museums in reproducing fine artwork starting with the imaging of the original work then digital processing and lastly repurposing for output to achieve a high quality replica in a range of possible media There are many areas of importance within this process such as digital image processing standardization test targets use and color management This research has sought to analyze the fine art image interchange through understanding the background areas and how they apply as well as benchmarking what museums are already doing with the intention of improving and standardizing the process Upon completion of an adequate background study of the literature concentrated on color management theory test targets use and fine art reproduction this research focused on four main areas First a review of international standards was established and how they can be used to benefit museums Second a review of test targets was conducted and how best they can be implemented in fine art reproduction Third a number of museum workflows were benchmarked and documented a workflow experiment was created and implemented for documentation purposes and future image quality analysis Lastly a case study was conducted of a local fine art museum s process of creating a fine art catalog to better understand an average museum s fine art image interchange The research concluded that the practice of standardization could be improved within museums As far as test targets there was a large range of understanding and use The benchmarking of three museums was completed and it was determined that the process of documenting workflow was a difficult task to have implemented Lastly in the case study much was gained through the interviews placing a great importance on communication planning and standardization
