

The Canadian Study of Health and Aging: Risk factors for Alzheimer's disease in Canada

The Canadian Study of Health and Aging*

Article abstract—Objective: To study risk factors for Alzheimer's disease (AD) based on data from the Canadian Study of Health and Aging. Design: Population-based case-control study. Setting: Communities and institutions in 10 Canadian provinces. Participants: Two hundred fifty-eight cases clinically diagnosed with probable AD, with onset of symptoms within 3 years of diagnosis, and 535 controls, frequency matched on age group, study center, and residence in community or institution, clinically confirmed to be cognitively normal. Main outcome measure: Odds ratios (ORs) were calculated using unconditional logistic regression for previously hypothesized and potential risk factors for AD. Results: The OR for family history of dementia was significantly elevated (2.62; 95% confidence interval [CI], 1.53 to 4.51) and increased with the number of relatives with dementia. Those with less education were at higher risk of AD, with an OR of 4.00 (95% CI, 2.49 to 6.43) for those with 0 to 6 years, in comparison with those with 10 or more years. Head injury achieved borderline significance. A history of arthritis resulted in a low risk of AD (OR = 0.54; 95% CI, 0.26 to 0.81), as did a history of use of nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs. Initial analyses showed an increased risk of AD for occupational exposure to glues as well as to pesticides and fertilizers; the increased risk was greater in those with less education. Conclusion: This study confirmed a number of previously reported risk factors for AD, but provided little support for others. A new finding was an increased risk for those with occupational exposure to glues as well as pesticides and fertilizers, but this needs further study.

NEUROLOGY 1994;44:2073-2080

The problem of Alzheimer's disease (AD) is becoming increasingly important as more people reach ages at which the risk of AD increases markedly.¹ In Canada, the population aged 65 and over numbered 3.2 million in 1991. This represents the fastest growing segment of the population, and it is expected to more than double to 7.8 million by the year 2031.²

Little is known with any certainty about the risk factors for AD. Except for age and a positive family history of AD, no definite risk factors have been established, although there is some indication of an association with a positive family history of Parkinson's disease and Down's syndrome, a history of depression, severe head trauma, and smoking.³

The data from 11 major case-control studies on AD⁴⁻¹⁴ were re-analyzed by the EURODEM group.¹⁵⁻²⁰ A family history of dementia was one of the strongest and most consistently observed associations; a positive history of Down's syndrome was also associated with AD. There was a somewhat weaker association between a family history of

Parkinson's disease and AD, based on two of the studies.^{7,11,20}

There was some evidence of an increased risk in subjects with mothers aged 15 to 19, but stronger evidence of an association between late maternal ages and the risk of AD, particularly for those without a positive family history of AD.¹⁷

Pooling data from seven studies on history of head trauma with loss of consciousness resulted in an elevated odds ratio (OR) among AD patients that was statistically significant.^{7,8,10,12,18,21,22}

The EURODEM group examined the history of several medical conditions.¹⁹ The risk of AD in those with hypothyroidism was significantly increased, whereas there was no association with hyperthyroidism or goiter. A history of depression was positively associated with AD in late-onset cases, based on the re-analysis of four studies.^{8,9,15,22,23} The risk of AD was statistically significantly inversely related to the presence of osteoarthritis. Headaches including migraine were negatively associated with AD. The analysis included
