California's cap-and-trade program step by step

HOW CALIFORNIA BUILT THE CORNERSTONE OF ITS CLIMATE POLICY

California has some of the most ambitious climate targets on the planet. The fifth largest economy in the world, California also boasts impressive job and economic growth. It's no wonder the state has become a key example of successful climate policy.

At the heart of California's approach is cap and trade, an emissions trading system (ETS) that places a firm limit on carbon pollution while providing businesses flexibility to make the lowest-cost reductions first. Many other governments are using a similar strategy: emissions trading programs such as cap and trade are in place in over 50 locations covering over one billion people, and more than 90 countries expressed interest in using markets to meet their Paris commitments.

Based on years of experience in studying and designing environmental trading systems, EDF co-authored a handbook for the World Bank in 2016 that identified the 10 steps essential to effective ETS policy design.

In the following pages, we draw from this 10-step formula and from EDF's decade of experience helping California develop its cap-and-trade program, and provide a clear illustration of how one of the world's most expansive cap-and-trade programs began and matured.

Designing, implementing and operating an ETS in 10 steps

Step 1: Decide the scope

Step 2: Set the cap

Step 3: Distribute allowances

Step 4: Consider the use of offsets

Step 5: Decide on temporal flexibility

Step 6: Address price predictability and cost containment

Step 7: Ensure compliance and oversight

Step 8: Engage stakeholders, communicate and build capacities

Step 9: Consider linking

Step 10: Implement, evaluate and improve
