Evaluation and Education Milbrey Wallin McLaughlin,Denis Charles Phillips,1991 Creative Idea Evaluation Daniel Zeitlen,2025 Creativity is not limited to the process of generating new ideas as it also involves the evaluation and selection of ideas based on relevant criteria Prior work indicates that creative idea production is supported by both executive abilities and spontaneous associative abilities However the cognitive processes underlying creative idea evaluation remain unclear especially across domains and levels of expertise Relatedly previous attempts to manipulate creative evaluation via cognitive interventions have generally been unsuccessful Therefore this dissertation investigates the cognitive bases of creative evaluation and production in the STEM domain of engineering design for people with and without domain expertise and whether instructional strategies can manipulate creative evaluation abilities and impact creative production Study 1 tested a novel instructional strategy manipulation of creative evaluation standards by randomly assigning participants i e college students N 511 to receive no strategy instructions in the control condition or to receive instructions on a creative evaluation task and subsequent creative production task telling them to evaluate the creativity of ideas leniently harshly or moderately Results revealed that compared to the control condition individuals in the moderate condition who were instructed to be critical but fair demonstrated higher evaluation accuracy and provided lower creativity ratings for the least creative ideas However no reliable manipulation effects emerged for idea selection or creative production Two samples were analyzed in Study 2 including the novice control group from Study 1 N 127 and a sample of individuals with engineering expertise N 115 recruited from Prolific who followed the same study procedure as the novice group Results revealed that executive ability i e intelligence positively predicted evaluation accuracy and intrapersonal selection originality in both samples as well as the originality of ideas produced in the novice sample Spontaneous associative ability i e free association positively predicted the originality of ideas produced and intrapersonal selection originality in the sample with expertise but was unrelated to all creative abilities in novices Altogether these studies introduce an efficient intervention for enhancing creative evaluation accuracy and clarify the cognitive bases of creative evaluation and production in STEM across varying degrees of domain expertise
