

THE NEW YORKER

Illustrated THE NEW YORKER From 11 covers

Everyone seems to have a notion of what makes a New Yorker cover, but it would be difficult to find a common stylistic denominator in the works of, say, Arthur Gaskin, George Price, Ed Keene, Neal Brossberg, Gertrude Dow Simpson, Chuck Brown, Peter Arno, and Constantino Manzi. There is one thing, however, that these covers all share—each is clearly the work of a distinctive artistic personality. If the covers of the magazine vary one way or another, it is contained in this simple fact: they announce The New Yorker as a weekly forum for a wide range of distinctive talents, poets, writers, journalists, and artists come together to discuss, in their various voices, the issues of the day or yesterday or, occasionally, tomorrow.

To choose a particular question, James Gargity once defined a New Yorker cover as "Whatever I like." In fact, since The New Yorker did not at that time commission cover work, the covers could be more accurately described as representing what the artists liked. Until recently, the covers of The New Yorker were related to the editorial content of the magazine and often, with the exception of the changing seasons and the required holidays, seemed to have little to do with the world outside the magazine. World War II, of course, was too large to be ignored, but in general, the covers reflected the prevailing mood unconsciously, if at all. The war seemed either large and impersonal—Arthur Gaskin's caricatures, Charles Martin's scenes of Central Park—or small-scale and personal—the quiet beauty of May Penty or the grim scenes of John Ficker. Covers that were essentially colored cartoons, such as this example by Whitney Darrow, Jr., continued to appear but not as frequently as before the war.
