

Crucible of Despair: the effects of nuclear war

Anthony Tucker and John Gleisner

"The fact is that civil defence, however much is spent upon it, can have only marginal effects on the chances of survival and more at all on the quality of the remnants of society. As Lord Cavers has said, if nuclear war comes it will be better not to survive. These assumptions were accepted by Government in the 1950s and have recently been reaffirmed internationally. Why should the British Government have reversed its view?"

The volte-face is a direct and inevitable consequence of changing the national nuclear posture from one of nuclear deterrence into nuclear war fighting. This is bolstered by new generations of tactical nuclear weapons and the NATO stance, both of which embody the tacit assumption that "thermic" nuclear wars can be fought and won. This concept, which puts all-out nuclear war on a hair-trigger, necessitates the persuasion of the public that nuclear war is less horrible than was formerly believed, may be necessary as part of something called "détente," and can be made bearable by simple and inexpensive measures of civil defence. This attempt by Western Governments to ball populations into entirely false views of the most advanced technology in the history of man can quite properly be regarded as a gross, wicked and even insane deception."
