

What are Cultural Landscapes?

Cultural landscapes are places within U.S. national parks that have significance in American history and authenticity to a historic time period. As identified by the National Park Service, the components of cultural landscapes include human-modified ecosystems such as forests, prairies, rivers and shores, as well as constructed works, such as mounds, terraces, structures and gardens. Here's a basic introduction to cultural landscapes. Find out more at nps.gov/culturallandscapes and follow us on social media!

They are part of a system of cultural resources (above) that are products of history and culture. Cultural landscapes help us to understand and experience historic places as a whole.

The majority of national park units (417 in 2017) contain cultural landscapes. There are more than 800 throughout the system.

They vary broadly from historically designed, to agricultural, industrial, ceremonial and spiritual places.

They all have authenticity or "historic integrity." This means they are recognizable as the places from the historically significant period.

They can be found anywhere, from cities to wilderness.

They range in age from thousands of years to just decades old. And they vary from naturally-occurring places like Devils Tower in Wyoming, to entirely human-made places, like the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial in Missouri.

They vary in size from many thousands of acres to less than an acre.
