ABSTRACT: Many changes in the concept of educational psychology right now, so that self-regulated learning has been a major focus of research. There are some similarities that emerge from different theoretical concepts that exist in learning self-regulation. Model self-regulated learning is rooted in a broader conception of the development of self-regulation has been associated with a variety of domains to understand how active a person's role, objectives and reflect on their own function or behavior. Contemporary models of self-regulated learning proposing that the self-regulated learning is influenced by social factors and contextual, so it supports the perspective of social-cognitive most well understood is the reciprocal relationship, where cognitive personal factors, environment and behavior interact by way of reciprocity. The interrelationship, which includes the social environment and a variety of learning contexts, is as fundamental social cognition. The neighborhood has a significant impact on development, and also affects actualizing self-regulated learning. Seeing the cognitive and social perspective, requires the assumption that the social and the self is seen as a separate entity, while the role of social and environmental factors are factors to influence students and provide opportunities for the development of self-regulated learning skills. The theoretical framework of self-regulated learning assumes that social factors as a central factor.

Keywords: self-regulated learning, models of self-regulated learning, social factors.

Self-regulated learning is both a theory and a field of research on self-regulated school learning which emerged in the mid-1980s. Focusing on the principle that learning is an active and constructive process, research has enquired into the ways in which learners can take control of their own learning processes. Self-regulation is a key element within this theoretical framework. Zimmerman considers it important to clarify that self-regulation is not a mental ability and neither is it a skill linked to specific academic performance but rather it is a self-directed process by means of which learners transform their mental abilities into skills linked to activity practiced in a specific context. Such an approach sees learning as an activity which students do for themselves in a proactive way.

Research and observations on self-regulated learners in different times and using a range of methods have demonstrated that they approach school activities diligently, confidently and in an entrepreneurial way. Furthermore, they show awareness both of when they know a given fact or possess a specific ability and when they do not. In contrast with their 'passive' classmates, proactive self-regulated students search out information and adopt whatever measures are necessary to take control of it. When they encounter adverse situations such as bad study conditions, confusing teachers or text books which are difficult to understand they find ways to succeed in any case. Self-regulated learners see knowledge acquisition as a systematic and controllable process and feel greater responsibility in the achievement of their results. They show that they:
