

Nature vs. Nurture

Biologists' interest in nature/nurture differences really started with the 1950s. This was because the very nature of the scientific approach is to test ideas by experimentation. But the idea of testing differences in a child's development is difficult because you have to control the child's environment. So what is usually done is to try to find the similarities between a child raised in a different environment from the rest of the population and children with a normal upbringing.

Biologists thought that the fact that some twins raised in different places were similar to each other was a good indication that you could find differences that are genetic, but with the development of more advanced techniques, biologists have found twins and fraternal twins raised in different environments. Biologists also investigate similarities in behavior in the children of identical twins separated at birth. Some cases are similar and caused by sharing genes, but some are different. It is possible that the effect of environment is not so straightforward. Despite a common genetic inheritance, people are not identical.

In contrast, through studies on identical twins, we have found similarities between them because they have the same genetic inheritance. However, it is not clear what these are and what these are and what are environmental differences. There are 2 twins that were separated at birth and raised in different environments. They are similar to each other, but the fact that they are separated at birth is not clear. It is not clear what these are and what these are, but the fact that they are separated at birth is not clear. It is not clear what these are and what these are, but the fact that they are separated at birth is not clear.

Biologists' efforts to understand the differences have also shown that they are not so straightforward as they are. It is not clear what these are and what these are, but the fact that they are separated at birth is not clear. It is not clear what these are and what these are, but the fact that they are separated at birth is not clear. It is not clear what these are and what these are, but the fact that they are separated at birth is not clear.

Conclusion:

There is a lot of research and further experiments to understand the differences between nature and nurture.
