tombs of the Bylany culture round Kolin. While the Platenice urnfields occupy eastern Bohemia, the richer centre of the land is taken up by the Bylany cemeteries. These comprise relatively poor cremations in urns, large graves containing half-burned skeletons either alone or with an inhumation, and spacious shaft-graves under barrows containing skeletons, normally extended but occasionally contracted. All the latter graves are richly furnished and often contain joints of pork. A few among them are genuine royal tombs and contain hearses. Dr Dvořák describes in detail five such graves that he himself excavated as well as a dozen or so similar tombs observed earlier and less accurately. Thanks to careful digging and precise observation the author has been able to recover many details in the construction of these four-wheeled hearses and, what is most surprising, the yokes to which the horses were attached. The wheels with 6 to 8 spokes measured 80 to 82 cm. in diameter while the tyres were studded with iron nails and slightly wider than the felloes, the naves of wood plated with iron. The yokes of oak wood partly cased in leather were richly decorated with a mosaic of bronze nails and were carved at both ends. One at least was regarded as so valuable that it had been wrapped in linen and encased in a wooden box before burial.

Now in at least three graves three bits were found of which two in each case belong to Gallus' type II. The yokes are actually long enough to allow of three horses abreast but it seems more likely that the third bit, which is usually found some distance from the other two and is often of rather different pattern, stood for the war-horse that would doubtless be led to the grave in the funeral procession. He is of course thus represented on Hallstatt urns and on an ivory sheath as well as in Greek and Etruscan funerary scenes.

The grave-goods include further many vases graphited or painted in colours, long iron Hallstatt swords, a lug axe, and those curious clay crescents generally termed 'Moon Symbols', but hardly ever a fibula. Apart from this negative trait, the ritual and furniture with which these Bohemian kinglets were buried agrees very closely with those long familiar from the plundered Chieftains' Graves of southwest Germany, Switzerland and eastern France. From this agreement Dvořák and Filip draw the conclusion that the Hallstatt rulers of Central Bohemia were already Kelts though their subjects included members of an Urnfield population. The justice of their conclusions is confirmed by reference to the rôle of pork in the funerary feast; in view of the prominence of swine among the historical Kelts including the Parisii of Yorkshire. (That is of course not a trait peculiar to Kelts—joints of pork are reported for instance from cremation graves of the Bordei-Herăstrău culture in Roumania which is just pre-La Tène and presumably Thracian or Agathyrsian). EARLY INDIAN PAINTED POTTERY. By D. H. GORDON. Journ. Indian Soc. Oriental Art, XIII (1945), 35.

In this study Col. Gordon draws attention to the danger of thinking in terms of a 'Painted Pottery Period' in Indian prehistory, since the technique of pottery painting has lasted little changed in North-West India until the present day. Such an idea has long been exploded in Europe, and would hardly be held by reputable Oriental scholars even in India, but the warning may be valuable to the amateur. Gordon refers to the late Brig. Ross's invaluable work at Rana Ghundai (now published in Journ. Near Eastern Studies v (1946), 284-316), but seems to under-rate the Buff Ware and Red Ware grouping of Iranian prehistoric wares and their Indian counterparts—a broad distinction which we owe to McCown and seems to the reviewer not only the only reasonable basis for classification, but one which really does make sense in the light of
