In this chapter, we argue that deeper insight into the social nature of self-development can be gained by adopting a dual focus on social relationships and meaning making. A key challenge for future scholarship will be to investigate the role of semiotic mediation in self-construction during the early years of life.

Developing Selves Are Meaning-Making Selves: Recouping the Social in Self-Development

Peggy J. Miller, Sarah C. Mangelsdorf

Most developmental theories share the assumption that self-development is an inherently social process. The self develops in interaction with others; even in cultures that celebrate individualistic selves no one develops a self alone. The social nature of the self is central not only to theories of self-development per se (Mead, 1934) but to theories of attachment (Bowlby, 1982), object relations (Mahler, Pine, & Bergman, 1975), and friendship (Youniss, 1980) as well. Despite this consensus on so fundamental a point, we still know little about self-construction as a social process. In this chapter, we identify three social arenas—(infant-caregiver relationships, early conversations, and personal narrative)—that hold promise for illuminating this process, focusing on the early years of life.

These social arenas are linked by another basic premise: that self-construction is a meaning-making process. The self emerges in the crucible of social relations, but those relations are embedded in cultural contexts and mediated by language and other semiotic systems. Long before they are able to comprehend words, babies derive meaning from touch, intonation, and gaze, building practical understanding of self and parent. Once language emerges, another kind of self-understanding becomes possible. According to G. H. Mead (1934), self-formation depends on the ability to be an object to oneself, a reflexive achievement made possible only through language. Recent attempts to extend Vygotskian theory highlight the role of discourse-level language, especially narrative, in creating self and identity (Miller, 1994;
