

A BRIEF HISTORY OF CHINESE MEDICINE IN SINGAPORE

Yan Yang

Singapore is a multiracial and multicultural country with ethnic Chinese (74%), Malays (13%) and Indians (9%) accounting for most of its population. It was a British colony from 1819 to 1963. During this time, it attracted waves of Chinese immigrants from China and around the Malay Peninsula from the nineteenth century onwards. Chinese medicine was brought into Singapore with the influx of Chinese immigrants. In the absence of a municipal system of medical care and poor relief, the Chinese medical delivery system comprising medical institutions, medical halls, clan-based recuperation centres and individual Chinese physicians, who operated from temples, market place or their own homes, filled a much-felt void in the lives of the Chinese plebeian classes (Yeoh 1991: 38–9). Chinese medicine remains relevant today. Singapore was recently praised by a World Health Organization (WHO) officer for pioneering good policies that protect against the perceived dangers of Traditional Chinese Medicine (TCM) resulting from poor integration with biomedical safety checks (Chan 2016).

Although Western medicine is the main form of healthcare in contemporary Singapore, Chinese medicine continues to enjoy considerable popularity. Chinese medicine practice in Singapore is confined to outpatient care. Chinese medicine practitioners are also called Chinese physicians, herbalists or therapists, but not doctors, as 'doctor' is reserved for registered Western medicine practitioners. According to a survey conducted by the Singapore government in 1994, 45% of Singaporeans had consulted a TCM practitioner at least once, and 19% of the population had visited TCM clinics in the last year. The proportion who had sought care from a TCM practitioner was highest among Chinese (54%), with 16% of Indians and 8% of Malays surveyed having also attended at least once. TCM was favoured slightly more by the elderly. The main reasons for consulting TCM practitioners were sprains, aches and pain, and the common cold (Ministry of Health 1995: 12).

There are some anthropological and sociological studies of health systems in Singapore, focussing on the phenomena of Chinese medicine practices and practitioners (Wu 1987: 71–94; Quah 1990: 122–59; Sinha 1996; Smith 2018). Historical research on Chinese medicine in Singapore is relatively scarce. Several Chinese physicians wrote about the important persons, institutions and events in the history of its development from the internal historical approach (Lee 1983, 1986; Tan 2001, 2007; Wong 2012). Some historians have emphasised the importance of Singapore's context in discussing the development of Chinese medicine
