Accounting as a Social and Institutional Practice: Perspectives to Enrich our Understanding of Accounting Change

In the past two decades, a body of literature has developed which depicts accounting as a social and institutional practice. Researchers adopting this perspective typically demonstrate an appreciation for the pervasive and enabling characteristics of accounting and an awareness of the importance of local, time-specific factors which shape accounting change within particular instances. This work examines this literature and classifies its content using the themes identified by Miller (1994). Drawing upon aspects of this literature, the final sections develop a broad, thematic framework to assist researchers in future studies directed at understanding the diverse and complex processes through which changes to the accounting domain can occur.

The author wishes to acknowledge the helpful comments of Tony Berry, Garry Carnegie, Christopher Napier, two anonymous referees and the editor, Graeme Dean, on earlier drafts of this manuscript.

¹ The list of references provided is not exhaustive and the 'visibilities' identified by these authors are not uniform. Rather, the central point is that researchers have begun to depict accounting practices as providing particular ways of 'representing' and 'understanding' abstract phenomena that may not otherwise be possible.
