Auditing in Russia

Issues in auditing

In this chapter we cover the nature of auditing, its incorporation into the Russian system, and the auditing procedures being developed in Russia. Auditing, as it currently understood internationally is fairly new to Russia and the other former Soviet republics (FSU). (See in this regard Appendix A, "A Brief History of Accounting in Russia").

The reforms of the economic structure of the Russian Federation (Russia, the major successor state of the former Soviet Union) involved the transition from an administrative command economy to the market economy to a solid market economy. These reforms are in full swing and are having a profound impact on the development of accounting and auditing for two reasons. First, accounting and auditing, in adapting to the changing needs of the economic structure, are called on to solve a number of new theoretical and political problems. Second, both accounting and auditing play a significant role in the economic activities of the country.

Auditing, as the term is understood in the West, did not exist in the USSR, nor has it ever existed in Russia. Throughout the history of Russia, the pervasive power of the state and the absence (or very limited existence) of private ownership have made the emergence of an auditing profession impossible. The notion of an independent controller was absolutely alien to the consciousness of administrators, managers, and professionals. While they understood that their performance had to be monitored, they believed that the evaluator should report what he was told, rather what he thought or had discovered about an organization's activities.

Nor did government officials have any use for independent auditors. They regarded all subordinate enterprises as under their full control and would not have wanted an outsider to investigate their operations. Because Russia was - in fact still is - a country of administrative rather than civil law, where vertical ties have always prevailed over horizontal ones, the concepts of 'control' and 'controller' were used instead of 'audit' and 'auditor'. The term 'revision' (inspection) also was widely used.

In Annex A to this chapter, we have given an historical assessment of auditing in the USSR and Russia, as this historical insight will help our readers gain a deeper understanding of current development taking place in the field of auditing in Russia. In Annex A we have also briefly outlined current developments in connection with internal auditing and tax auditing (see Section 3, The Period of Changes (Since 1991)).

The situation in regard to auditing has changed gradually since 1987 for several reasons:
