In classical population dynamic models all the individuals in a population are assumed to be identical or only population averages are considered. The state of the population is therefore the number of individuals or the total amount of biomass in the population. The mathematical model is a first-order ordinary differential equation (ODE) that specifies the time derivative of this population state. Subsequently, the dynamics of an ecosystem where populations interact with each other and with their abiotic environment is usually described by a system of ODEs. The classical models are sometimes called unstructured population models, as opposed to structured population models, which take into account the differences between individuals and characterize an individual by some state. The development of this state is modeled from birth till death, often using a first-order ODE that specifies the time derivative of the individual state. The model is complemented with models for the birth and death of individuals. The structured population model is derived straight forwardly from the individual model using balance laws. The state of a population is no longer a single number; it is the distribution of the individuals over their possible states. If the number of individuals is large, this distribution is continuous instead of discrete. If, in addition, the distribution is a density with respect to the individual state, the population model can be written as a partial differential equation (PDE). The first structured
