I. INTRODUCTION

The progress in information and communication technologies and the birth of the internet has changed the end user computing experience and environment. This advancement has changed the way of delivering information and services. Information systems can now be web-enabled, unlike the traditional stationary information systems. Web based means the information systems include in the website. Web portals are a part of this advancement. A Web portal is a gateway to information and services from multiple sources in a unified way, using a single, unique user interface. A Web portal usually features specific functions, such as search mechanisms, access to databases, user registration and personalization options.

Internet marketing for digital products and services is one of the most significant developments in the information systems industry in the last five years. A Web portal usually features specific functions, such as search mechanisms, access to databases, user registration and personalization options. Web portals have been widely used during the last years and can be classified into horizontal portals, which cover many areas of interest and vertical portals, which are focused on one specific area. Web portals serve a variety of purposes, such as personal, governmental, informational, entertaining and educational purposes.

Develop and validate an instrument for measuring user satisfaction in a web-based environment. In this research, three commercial websites were taken as representatives of Web-Based Information Systems (WBIS) for e-services. This study involved testing the validity and reliability of the end-user satisfaction over a set of heuristics, based on responses from users of three e-service websites (Pokrel and Vemalapalli, 2010).
