

The agricultural revolution

The invention of agriculture and livestock breeding in the Neolithic (10,000 BC) was one of the key transformations in the history of humanity. For the first time, human beings developed permanent settlement patterns and became productive groups growing their own food. They stopped depending on what their surroundings offered them and started intervening in the production process. Gradually, they created a specialization in the creation of tools and in division of tasks.

Food in the village

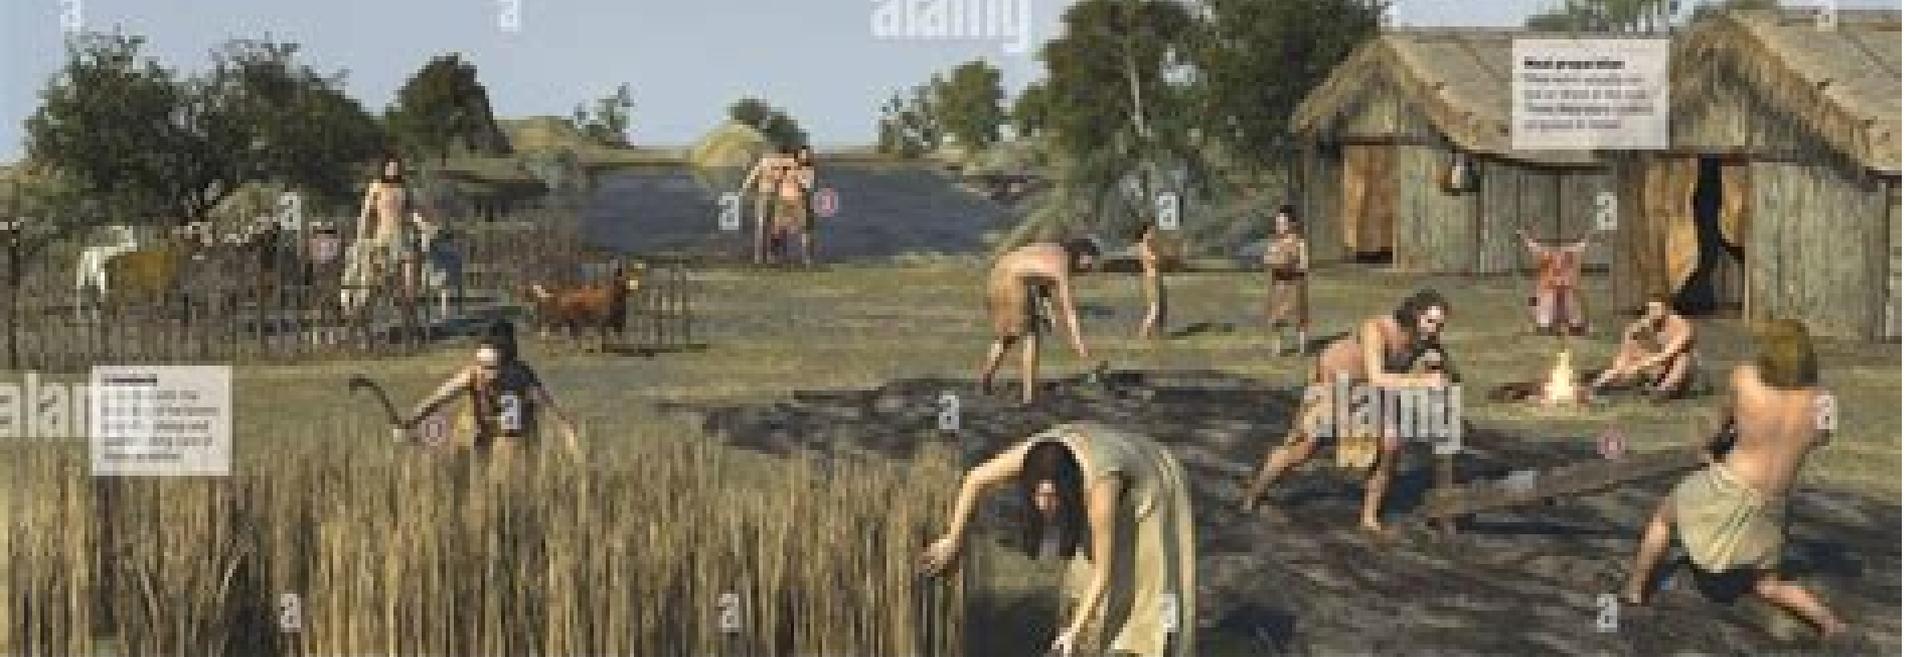

The division of work in a subsisting for some of hunter-gatherers. Agriculture and stockbreeding require differentiated tasks that were achieved through the year. Sowing and harvesting were the moments of greatest activity. Parallel to this, villagers added the grain, produced the containers to keep them, created the livestock and processed their meat.

- 1 Production cycle
The first step in the food cycle is sowing. The farmer plants seeds in the soil and waits for them to grow. The soil is then tilled and the seeds are sown again.
- 2 Harvesting
The farmer harvests the crops and takes them to the granary. The grain is then stored for use later.
- 3 Processing
The grain is processed into flour and then baked into bread. The farmer also uses the grain to feed his livestock.
- 4 The store
The farmer stores the grain in a granary. The granary is a structure made of mud or stone that is used to store grain for long periods of time.

Key facts
The agricultural revolution led to the development of permanent settlements, the invention of writing, and the beginning of civilization.

What you will see
The Neolithic revolution led to the development of permanent settlements, the invention of writing, and the beginning of civilization.
