Chapter I

THERE was nothing under the overstuffed chair by the window, nothing behind the sofa. The grandfather clock in the corner ran noisily with a rickety-rickety-rickety sound. Probably the uproar the old clock made was the reason that no one ever stayed in the north parlor any longer than they had to. The front of the clock was glass and offered no concealment.

Monk Mayfair continued searching. The window was closed and locked. Both doors were shut. There was an old-fashioned brass screen in front of the fireplace, so that even a bird couldn't have gone up the chimney. The ancient, rich draperies hung gracefully at the window with nothing behind them. Into the ancient, dignified parlor came a trace of the traffic rumbling on Park Avenue. Even the traffic noise was dignified here in the room.
