

Bernard Shaw's Heartbreak House: The War in 'Neverland'

AXEL KRUSE

One of the achievements of recent Shaw studies has been to present Heartbreak House as a play of apocalyptic and eschatological vision in which the first world war is seen as a crisis in European civilization.¹ This essay is concerned with the meaning of 'heartbreak' in relation to Shaw's vision of the war in Heartbreak House, and, in particular, with connections between Heartbreak House and the fashionable 'heartbreak' of Barrie's Peter Pan and Shaw's correspondence with Mrs Patrick Campbell. It seems to me that this approach might be useful in order to oppose a drift in recent criticism towards depoliticization of Heartbreak House and a view that in this play Shaw's usual concern with socialist reformism and revolution is replaced by despair and questions about whether it is possible for mankind and civilization to survive the war. So, for example, A. M. Gibbs concludes that 'the ambivalence of Heartbreak House is one essential part of its strength' and says that Shaw's refusal 'to be unfaithful to the human materials of the play' makes it 'a great work of dramatic art, and not a diatribe'.² In contrast, it seems to me that, while Heartbreak House achieves a complicated kind of inclusiveness, it is not less political than Shaw's other major plays, and that it includes the effect of a diatribe from the twentieth-century holocaust/abyss as well as the ambiguity, contradictory impulses and contradictory dramatic progressions which are characteristic of so many of the great works of early modernism.³ Shaw's plays involve special relations between political comment and his understanding and use of cultural and dramatic tradition. Heartbreak House is an attempt to respond to his sense of crisis in civilization with social and cultural analysis which might explain the pathological conditions of the old order
